Up Close and Personal with Peter Arpesella

Foto by Dean Ronalds

Several months ago I got an email from Peter Arpesella. Imagine my surprise when I realized who he was. I have to admit to being a little star-struck, but the man that corresponded with me and whom I now proudly call friend wasn't what I would have expected him to be. He was humble, and he was just another author who wanted the best for his upcoming release.

When I started the Virtual Ebook Fair he was right in the promotion mode with the rest of us sharing and helping one another. It's been such a positive experience watching the progression of his novel from manuscript to cover decisions to finally just a short time ago that much anticipated moment in any author's life when they can finally hold their baby in their hands.

It's my pleasure to get up close and personal with Peter Arpesella for you our readers in our launch issue FEATURE.

"I'd share a bit about Peter, but his bio says it all."

Diabetes in Fiction: Good Like This by Peter Arpesella

April 2, 2014 By Leo Brown

In Peter Arpesella's debut novel, Good Like This, we see diabetes bare and tumultuous. Any person with diabetes will relate, whether to the relentless requirements of care, the seeming impossibility of taking just the right amount of insulin, the shame, the awkward moments, the proliferation of syringes, the reliance on technology, the technological malfunctions, and the spectrum of relationships with medical professionals, from mutually supportive to outright adversarial.
